This anthology contains the first three issues of the series.

Apreszion

Grandfather said the cities fell because they were decadent. He is a man of learning, my grandfather. He said that when the Romans became decadent, they fell. When the British became decadent, they fell. When the Americans became decadent, they too fell. When the Americans fell, everyone fell.

Grandfather said that the great cities burned, then crumbled. Some, like his grandfather, were able to escape the cities and make their way to the forests and survived there. Many were not so lucky. They were killed in the fires, leaving the smoldering cities littered with charred corpses.

Some survived and remained in the cities. Over time, however, there were simply too few people with the knowledge needed to keep their dwellings in livable condition. The fall of civilization became complete as the remaining buildings themselves fell to the charred earth and buried many of the few humans who remained in their rubble.

Now there is only us, living in the forest and in the plains that border what used to be the world's greatest cities.
