In hindsight it is apparent that the debates and arguments over weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and Iraq that was evident in the 12 years from Operation Desert Storm (1991) until Operation Iraq Freedom (2003) had become a victim to an unintended confusion between the narrative and the discourse. The many thousands of journalistic accounts can be considered along a range of combinations on a sliding scale of ensuring 100% accuracy or a sensational story that might contain rumours or innuendos when pandering to the demand of populace and indeed editors. Frequently the ability to sustain 100% certainty of evidence made the story not very sensational so journalism was faced with a dilemma. The time-line was many decades of innuendo. Few if any journalists and even not many of their sources actually saw any WMD themselves. Yet the journalists were compelled by editors to cover the overwhelming political intent voiced as rhetoric to wage war. This generated a confusion between "the limits of acceptable speech" - or possible truth whether or not Iraq did or did not have WMD. This confusion led to the discourse of opinion and debate becoming the narrative, which in hindsight proved to be a false narrative as no WMD was discovered in Iraq. Part and parcel of how the situation arose was the hazy distinction in newsworthiness between fictional and journalistic narrative on specific events. This is acceptable to journalism, as the populace demand a good story to remain tuned a specific TV channel or read a specific newspaper. The reconstruction of news as a 'story', of information in narrative style abides in the conventional wisdom of journalism. The global culture of 24 hours news channel with a craving populace and intense competition for advertising revenue provokes mass media to provide newsworthiness in a sensational story. This is not acceptable to national security decision-making that requires 100% precise information especially in the case of WMD and in justification for war.
